The information on the death certificate as place of death is false. Kenneth Werner died en-route from Miami, Florida to his home in San Diego, California, on a commercial airline. He was found dead in the rear toilet of the plane and his remains were placed in the last seat of the plane covered with a blanket until the plane landed at the downtown Dallas airport. I confirmed this with the airline he was the passenger on to thank them for their respectful treatment of my father's remains. He was dead upon arrival, but the coroner did not do an autopsy as required. He called Ken's son, the author of this bit of information, after talking with Ken's wife and asked some health questions as well as Kenneth W Quass' occupation. Kenneth was a national sales representative for several foreign auto parts manufacturers and was returning home from an extended visit with foreign auto parts suppliers and vehicle repair shops along the east coast of the USA. As a national sales representative, he had many friends and acquaintances in the USA. The coroner glibly put down as Ken's occupation as in 'auto sales' implying not of much importance and never performed an autopsy as federal law requires when one passes on a commercial airline. The coroner simply made an assumption as to the cause of death and noted the place of death as though it happened on the ground in Dallas. He then forged my signature on the death certificate as the informant. I resided in Minnesota at that time. In effect, Ken's cause of death is unknown. At his funeral, a close friend of the family asked me if an autopsy had been performed. I said no, and he replied you may wish one had been done, for he was well aware of my father's health. A year or so later a Minnesota based foreign auto parts supplier approached me to ask if I knew what my father died of. I said no, He replied if I had ever thought of foul play. He proceeded to offer 'facts' that would support foul play at the Miami airport. I won't go into that with this bit of information, but it proved quite plausible.
